Since 2002, the Community Health Symposium at Stanford School of Medicine has served to showcase the work of Stanford students, trainees, staff, faculty, and community partners in underserved communities in California and around the world. This symposium is an opportunity to find ways to improve the health of communities through research, education, and practice. It is an event to learn from our community partners, and to foster collaborations, conversation, and new thinking.

The Community Health Symposium at Stanford School of Medicine is an annual event that brings together students, trainees, faculty, and staff from Stanford University to share their work and ideas on community-engaged research and practice. The symposium includes keynote presentations, panel discussions, and poster sessions that highlight the latest research and developments in the field of community health.

The symposium is an opportunity to learn from our community partners, and to foster new collaborations, conversation, and new thinking. Whether you are looking to amplify the work of Stanford students, trainees, staff, faculty, and community partners, or to learn about the latest research and developments in the field of community health, the symposium is a must-attend event.

The symposium is open to anyone interested in community health, including students, trainees, faculty, and staff from Stanford University, as well as community partners and stakeholders.

If you have any questions or would like more information, please email us at communityengagement@stanford.edu.