DocumentarVOTE

A GW alum, Faith Fugar, will recount her experience as a PiAf fellow in Nairobi, Kenya and describe what PiAf is seeking to cultivate meaningful relationships with African communities and with one another.

The Nashman Center seeks service-minded, recent college grads (PiAf) offers highly selective yearlong fellowships to recent college graduates interested in working with international development organizations across the African continent. Fellows make significant contributions to projects focusing on education and sustaining mutually beneficial partnerships with community partners across the African continent and even internationally! There will be four core components of the fellowship: 1) support for projects in the host country, 2) hands-on learning, 3) professional networking opportunities, and 4) personal development opportunities. The fellowship is an opportunity to leverage your expertise and passion for international development in a truly unique way.

There are multiple positions available in each category and all positions can be performed remotely. If you have Federal Work Study, you can use it for these positions. There are multiple positions available in each category, and applications can be found monthly.

If you want to be a true professional, you will do something outside of yourself. – Ruth Bader Ginsburg
