This month's blogs explore the idea of change and re-examining the past. First, reflecting upon personal experiences to re-examine classroom learning. Second, discussing intergenerational trauma through the lens of a Disney film. And finally, highlighting repurposed drawers from the Peabody's old collection storage. I learned something from each of these and I hope that you do too!

NAGPRA, Repatriation, and Relearning History
Contributed by Ryan Wheeler
This blog is an email response by Peabody Director, Ryan Wheeler, to a follow-up question from a journalist writing a piece about the Seminole Tribe of Florida efforts to get the Smithsonian Institution's Museum of Natural History to repatriate ancestors being held there. Read on to learn more!

Disney’s Encanto and Intergenerational Trauma
Contributed by Lindsay Randall
Peabody Educator, Lindsay Randall, takes a deep dive into Disney’s Encanto. Learn more about the movie’s characters and how they must overcome something more overwhelming and real, which is threatening their home: intergenerational trauma.

Back with Even More Repurposed Drawers!
Contributed by Emma Lavoie
With the completion of our inventory, we have even more drawers to share with you that were repurposed by friends of the Peabody! Check them out here!
