Reflections on 'Balancing Privacy and Public Health during COVID-19'

December 16, 2020 by Nikita Munjal and Bonnie Hassanzadeh

On November 11, 2020, Osgoode Privacy Law Society \(OPLS\), in collaboration with Osgoode Health Law Association \(OHLA\) and Osgoode Constitutional Society \(OCLS\), held a panel event to discuss the existing tensions between public health and individuals' privacy rights that have been pushed to the forefront of conversations as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic. Dr. Andrea Slane of Ontario Tech, Carole Piovesan of INQ Data Law, Daniela Pacheco of Neinstein LLP, and Ian Stedman, Assistant Professor at York University, provided their expertise on issues such as contact-tracing apps, surveillance, and the changes in healthcare that have been propelled by the current pandemic. In this article, we will explore a few of the main points discussed by the panel.

Balancing Privacy and Public Health: The Paradoxical Aspect of COVID-19

December 17, 2020 by Khristoff Browning

On November 11, 2020, the collaborative efforts of Osgoode Hall's Health Law Association, Privacy Law Society, and Constitutional Law Society helped to host the "Balancing Privacy and Public Health During COVID-19" panel. The panel featured prominent lawyers and academics who spoke on the intersection of health law and privacy law and featured discussions about various topics concerning the ongoing pandemic. Paradoxically, while the implications of the COVID-19 pandemic continually force Canadians to socially isolate to help reduce the virus' transmission, data-sharing and compiling private information may be necessary for us to truly slow its effects.

Written by Khristoff Browning. Khristoff is a first year JD candidate at Osgoode Hall Law School. He is a first year representative for the Osgoode Health Law Association (OHLA), contributing IPilogue editor and IP Innovation Clinic Fellow.
