FERNANDO R. WILLELLI-MURILLO

Not long ago, away my shot

With your help, we have been working hard to help our community navigate the challenges of the COVID-19 pandemic. As a Masonian, you know that we are stronger together. That's why we are excited to announce that George Mason University will be hosting a vaccine clinic this week to help our community stay healthy and safe.

About a week ago, George Mason University President Gregory Washington sent an email to all Mason faculty and staff to let us know our university would be offering an opportunity to receive a COVID-19 vaccination. Within a week, a myriad of volunteers and healthcare professionals offered hundreds of appointments for our Mason nation for all interested. We are fortunate to have this opportunity as an institution, and we encourage all eligible individuals to consider receiving the vaccine.

We understand that everyone may feel differently about getting the vaccine. It's okay to have questions and concerns. The National Council of Higher Education Research (NCHEER) has recently released a statement on higher education and the COVID-19 vaccine. They encourage higher education institutions to promote vaccinations and provide resources to help students make informed decisions about the vaccine.

We believe in the power of education and community to help create a healthier and safer future. That's why we're excited to offer this opportunity to our community. We hope you'll consider getting vaccinated and joining us in our efforts to keep our community healthy and safe.

Sincerely,

The Mason Science Community
