The International Impasse on Digital Tax and Its Implications for Canada

November 26, 2020 by Jingcai Ying

Whether additional taxes should be levied upon multinational technology corporations is an ongoing international trade dispute. Any casual follower of the U.S. stock market will notice that many of the stand-out performers this year are the tech companies. Indeed, the COVID-19 pandemic seems to have spurred the growth of tech giants amidst a global economic contraction. Yet, many of these giant tech companies are being effectively taxed less than other multinational companies because they are particularly shrewd at parking their profits in low-tax jurisdictions. For example, with its 12.5% corporate tax rate—compared with Canada's 26.5% and the U.S.'s 21%—Ireland has been a tax haven for tech giants like Apple to offshore their profits.

Grappling with Google: Market Monopoly, Big Tech Exclusivity, and Political Plays

November 26, 2020 by Emily Xiang

In another attempt at tackling big tech, the U.S. government filed a civil antitrust lawsuit against Google in late October, alleging that the company has been illegally monopolizing the search and search advertising markets through the use of highly exclusionary contracts and anticompetitive practices. In an increasingly digital society, Google has been heralded as “the gatekeeper of the Internet”, and such a significant suit could have massive implications on the landscape of digital markets in the future.

Written by Emily Xiang, a first year JD candidate at Osgoode Hall Law School. She is an IPilogue editor and a 1L executive for the Intellectual Property Society of Osgoode.
