

Dear Parents,

I want to share with you a communication that NYU sent to students today about our expectations for how they conduct themselves (see below). The email was also shared with all faculty, administrators, and staff.

NYU is committed to each student's academic progress, and to maintaining an environment that allows students to pursue their studies while enhancing their safety and minimizing disruption. Please know how much your student's success means to us.

Sincerely,

Rafael Rodriguez, Dean of Students and Assoc. Vice President

Re: Reinforcing our Expectations for Student Conduct

As President Mills outlined in her opening message to our community, the beginning of a semester is a hopeful moment. I hope your spring semester has gotten off to a great start.

NYU's academic mission is at the core of what brings us together. Even as the free exchange of ideas is a tenet for our community, the University is committed to maintaining an environment that supports the steady and unimpeded fulfillment of our research, knowledge creation, teaching, and learning missions.

I feel compelled to remind you of our expectations for student conduct. If you engage in behavior that disrupts academic activities, University operations, or others' pursuit of their educational objectives, or if you break the rules or threaten or harass and violate our student conduct policy, you should expect to be held accountable.

I am heartened that our community is focused on their academic and professional goals, and that they continue to thrive; please know we are there to support you. I'm also confident that, even during these difficult moments, community members are finding respectful and permissible ways to express themselves and their beliefs on a myriad of subjects.

I wish you every success with the semester ahead.
