Welcome to the Peabody Institute’s November 2022 newsletter!
The fall term has ended and I am busy writing student comments for Human Origins (look for more on that course next month!). This issue includes a great photograph of archaeologist Margaret Ashley Towle, info on our experiments with storage cartons and microclimates, and curator Marla Taylor’s presentations at three conferences this fall. Visit next month for the release of our 2021-22 annual report! Enjoy!

A New Photo of Margaret Ashley Towle
Contributed by Ryan Wheeler
Several years ago as we organized the Peabody Institute’s extensive photographic collection, we were surprised to come across a group of black-and-white prints that had not been flattened. After proper conservation, we discovered one picture was of Margaret Ashley Towle, one of the pioneering female archaeologists of the southeastern United States. Read on to discover more!

New Box Test Results
Contributed by John Bergman-McCool
The Peabody is preparing for exciting building improvements in our collections area that will begin in April of 2023. In advance of the project, we initiated a few tests to see how the environment inside our collections boxes would respond to moving around our building. Read on to learn more about our findings!

Conference Season
Contributed by Marla Taylor
October/November is conference season! Peabody Curator of Collections, Marla Taylor, was an active participant in multiple conferences over the past couple months and really enjoyed connecting with colleagues after the worst of COVID. Read on for more about Marla’s conference experience.
