Next Steps for a Change

Emilee Bauer, Program Coordinator

Plant for a Change is the first for-profit plant business in Nashville co-managed by team members with disabilities. The business is committed to cultivating native habitats by educating the public on the value of gardening for wildlife and sustaining greener neighborhoods. They also strive to support native wildlife in this region by increasing the access and exposure of native plants. Plant for a Change sells products at the Farmers Market that provide water, food, places to raise young and cover for native wildlife.

Next Steps students and alumni, with the guidance of Fields, cultivate native plants and seeds, assemble documents, file taxes and paperwork, market and sell the products, and participate in meetings and trainings with local partners and environmental communities.

CEO, Nathan Fields, has a special connection with Next Steps at Vanderbilt. “When I was a graduate student, Peach came and spoke to our class and taught us about self-advocacy. Since then, I’ve been hooked. I got plugged in as a Best Buddy, became an Ambassadors, and some graduate students and I started a campus faith community group where students could pray together and read books together. Dr. Carter’s work inspired me to rethink traditional ways of creating programs to and for people with disabilities and instead, find ways to meaningfully include individuals with disabilities in the entire process of forming programs alongside individuals with disabilities.”

The idea for Plant for a Change was cultivated through the community prayer and study meetings, B3 (Believe Belong, Beloved). Diamond Grigsby, Next Steps Alumni, expressed her concerns for people with disabilities finding employment. “With 30 million plus people looking for jobs now, it’s only going to make it more difficult for people who have disabilities to find meaningful employment,” said Nathan Fields, “so, we started praying for jobs. But then, as we talked through our concerns, we then moved to praying that we might be able to create jobs for people. We hope we can be the answer to some people’s prayers, and believe we will one day be able to hire people with and without disabilities to have meaningful employment alongside one another.”

The Plant for a Change team has prepared an online shop at www.plantforachange.com to sell items on social media and online. While the business can currently sell at the Farmers Market in person on the weekends, they also provide delivery and porch side pickup services.

“We encourage people to follow us on Facebook or Instagram @plantforachange and to check out our monthly catalogs. We have an email subscription folks can join at bit.ly/pfacsub. If friends of Next Steps need soil, mulch, native plants, landscaping advice, birdhouses, bird feeders, bird seed, we promise we'll offer quality products made and delivered by quality people," Said Fields, "Dollars given to our business go to paying a competitive wage for our team members, managing our online website, paying our bills, and sustaining our inventory."
