Q&A with Colin Wallis

What’s your view for the future of the use of digital and blockchain technology in digital identity and privacy?

Ultimately, I see a much needed fusion between the community and its members. As a community, we have the ability to be more impactful. I can see this change at the level of our social responsibility to gain more focus on education and empowering the projects to come together. The more we work together and the more we bring in new ideas, the greater chance we have to work on the future we envision.

What’s your vision for the industry for the next decade?

By getting more involved. No one ever got fit and healthy by simply joining a gym. The more you put in, the more you get.

What is Kantara’s biggest challenge going forward? How do you plan to address it?

Actually it is managing our growth with the limited resources we have at our disposal. But we also have to be cognizant of the fragmentation occurring in the industry with new industry associations being created, it seems, nearly every week. That’s easy. It’s the unflagging support of the steadily growing volunteer member and non-member contributors who circle back time and again to take on more. Without them, Directors and Staff would not have the confidence to strike out in new directions. Everywhere I look there is an upside and growth – and where does Kantara fit into the mix?

What is Kantara’s biggest challenge giving up decades of conformity assessment and assurance programs.

By getting more involved. No one ever got fit and healthy by simply joining a gym. The more you put in, the more you get.

Ultimately, I want to see as much friction removed from the customer online experience as is secure and privacy-protected. It’s a great time to be part of Kantara.
